Lá Oíche (Luh EE-hyeh) is regarded as holding an immense power, strong enough to breach the veil between our world and the otherworld. As a being who tends to do most of it's work unseen, the inhabitants of The Enchanted Forest have been forced to come up with their own tales of the reasons it exists. To the Anam Cara, it's the benevolent keeper of the cycle, who places the sun in the sky each morning and the moon there each night. They worship it, thanking it for its commitment to the daily cycle and leaving small shrines and offerings for it all around the forest. While in the eyes of the Faiteas, Lá Oíche is the worst of all the spirits in the Enchanted Forest that there is to fear. Amongst them it's rumoured to be a terrifying monster who stalks the darkness looking for lost souls to claim in its lanterns. They say if you're caught out in the night alone, you won't even see it coming before Lá Oíche has already killed you and stolen your soul. Whose to say which tribe's depiction is more accurate?