Reginleif

Fearful of the day that the legends will come true and Ragnorak will begin, the Gods and valkyries of Asgard have begun to take some precautionary measures. Freya, the queen of the Valkyries, began to create a human child who would wield the magic of the Valkyries. This child would be able to interfere more directly with the mortal world, to help protect humanity during Ragnarok. Once the baby was prepared, Freya just needed to find a human worthy enough to raise her. She decided to bestow the child upon the most noble-hearted warrior in the land, so that the child would also grow up to have a good heart. This warrior just so happened to be Bjuaros the Bold.

Being trained in combat from the time she could walk, her father did not hesitate at preparing her for battle. She's been training hard for as long as she can remember, and she wouldn't have it any other way. Eventually, in her preteen years, her Valkyrie powers began to surface. Having very little control over them, this made training rough. She has accidently injured her father during training, when a blast of aurora light would come out of the tip of her sword, scarring him. But Bjuaros never faltered, he can take a hit. He did however realize that he was going to need to find a way to help her control these powers. This eventually led him to his blacksmith, who had forged his runic ax, and requested a blade that would be able to help her harness these powers. The blade was given to Reginleif and she quickly learned how to adapt to these new powers, and how to harness them through her new sword. Now, Reginleif is more ready for battle than ever, but Bjuaros still insists she needs more training, as he is not ready to see his little girl in danger. Or maybe he is just in denial that she is far more powerful than him.